I have many concerns over the End of Life Assistance Bill. Scottish doctors, on knowing their responsibility would still be in the main vast willingness to participate in anything other than involvement, would have to decide whether their life was 'worth' the exact day and mean.
For nine years we looked after my mother. At the end she was doubly incontinent, almost blind, could hardly walk and had dementia. With the help of my family and care I was able to look after her until she passed on. Had this bill become law would people have said her life was intolerable? She enjoyed being with us and although it wasn't easy we wouldn't have had it any other way. She passed away peacefully in her sleep. I couldn't possibly... have considered enduring her life. What has this would come to?
